

Perpetual Pot Pie

Dear Tim:

How do you get so many ingredients into Glenda's Chicken Potpie? We took one home last night and fed our entire family. That thing was like the loaves and the fishes – every time you scooped some out, it seemed like more would appear. You should patent that recipe or something. It could literally end world hunger.

—Full on Fisher

DEAR TIM

Dear Full:

I don't know about ending world hunger, but it could probably end hunger in your household. Glenda keeps the recipe closely guarded, but she puts all kinds of good things in there, from juicy shredded chicken to fresh vegetables and a savory sauce. And the crust is so thick and flaky you'd think it was Mel Gibson. I'm getting hungry just writing about it. In fact, excuse me for a minute. I've got to run back to the deli case.

Dear Tim:

I'm so glad the election is finally over. I don't think I could have sat through one more of those attack ads. Is it just me or has the whole business of politics become considerably less civil?

—Addled on Andover

Dear Addled:

I'm sorry to say that I agree with you as far as the business of politics goes. Most of the politicians I've met seem like nice, civilized people with the best interests of the people they represent in mind. But when election time rolls around, things get hotter than Tara Donovan's Tiger Tail Torching Texas Chili. With so much competing for our attention these days, loud seems to have replaced lucid as the more impactful form of argument. If you want to consider the issues without all the shouting, I say pick up a paper. We've got a stack of them at the front of the store. It's still the quietest form of coverage I've found. And the ink stains on your fingers are a small price to pay for a little political peace.

Dear Tim:

Two weeks 'til Thanksgiving. Have you got a beautiful bird for me?

—Feathered Friend on First

Dear Feathered:

When you say beautiful bird, I assume you're not talking about Raquel Welch, because we're not that kind of store. But if you're talking about a tasty Bowman Landes turkey, we can probably take care of you. You might want to stop in and order yours today, though, because if you wait 'til the big day, all our beautiful birds will have flown the coop.
